Reflection on Our Group Presentation

By: Gerald Ebacuado

Our group had the opportunity to present about self-hosting and cloud hosting. For me, the presentation was not only about explaining the topic. It was also a valuable experience as a host speaker. Speaking in front of the class helped me become more confident and more comfortable expressing my ideas.

As host speakers, we tried to keep the presentation organized and easy to follow. We introduced the topic, connected our ideas, and explained the differences between self-hosting and cloud hosting using simple examples and analogy. We also paid attention to the audience's reactions so we could adjust our pace and tone when needed.

One of the best parts of the presentation was interacting with the audience. Their responses and questions made the discussion feel more like a conversation instead of a one-way speech. We tried to capture and maintain their attention by speaking clearly, making eye contact, and involving them in the discussion. Seeing that they were listening and participating made us feel more motivated.

Teamwork also played an important role in our presentation. We supported one another, made our transitions smooth, and helped each other whenever someone needed a reminder or clarification. We enjoyed the whole experience because everyone contributed and worked together. Although the time limit was 25 minutes, our group finished in 27 minutes. The two-minute overrun is a learning point for us because it shows that we need to manage our time better. Next time, we should practice shorter explanations and monitor the time more closely.

Overall, the presentation taught me that a good presentation needs preparation, clear delivery, audience interaction, and teamwork. I also learned that enjoying the experience can help make the presentation more natural and engaging. Even though we went slightly over the time limit, I am happy with how our group presented the topic and worked together.
